

Joe Rogers is a retired Operations and Logistics management professional with over 20 years of experience in the garment and textile fields, most recently with Atlanta-based Oxford Industries where he served as Director of Operations for their private label division. Tasked with producing apparel on tight seasonal deadlines, Joe worked closely with retail customers, designers and international production teams to plan, forecast, and deliver products on time and on budget.

Early in his career, Joe learned many lessons that helped shape his managerial style and guide both his professional and personal development. The greatest of those lessons was the importance of building personal, lasting relationships that are based on mutual respect, integrity, empathy, and a willingness to adapt when necessary. To that end, Joe thrived on creating work environments that placed value not only on the bottom line, but also on creative problem solving, personal fulfillment and growth, empowerment of staff, and the importance of hearing every voice.

That lesson continues to inform his decisions and interactions to this day and is especially helping in his role as Ward Captain for his downtown Savannah neighborhood where he lives with his husband and two Welsh Terriers.
